

Argument 1

In these difficult budget times, school districts must make meaningful and careful budget decisions. What should we cut? Academics? Athletics? Extracurricular activities? Music? Art? No. Each of these areas is crucial to student development and learning. Another crucial area that should remain intact is the guidance department. A truly prosperous country must do everything in its power to support its youth. Providing extra services including organizing college applications, making course suggestions, and helping with personal problems is a necessary part of the average American high school today. To cut guidance departments would be shortsighted and might hurt our students, particularly students who are lacking in other resources. In this competitive world, we need to show our students compassion.

Argument 2

In these difficult budget times, school districts must make meaningful and careful budget decisions. What should we cut? Academics? Athletics? Extracurricular activities? Music? Art? No. Each of these areas is crucial to student development and learning. What we should cut are school guidance departments. Guidance departments breed dependence in a time when students should be figuring out how to navigate the world on their own. As a society, we must empower our students to find the answers to their questions using their own resources. This is a true life lesson. When an individual works hard toward a goal or answer, then the end result is more meaningful. Guidance is really nothing more than an extension of the welfare mentality where people put their issues into the hands of somebody else instead of doing the work on their own. We want our students to be strong and resourceful, not lazy and dependent.
